

QUIETLY

September 7, 2021, Bitcoin became legal tender in El Salvador, alongside the U.S. dollar. Every merchant, every bank, every business in the land is preparing to trade in Bitcoin.

Other nations following suit are looking to El Salvador as a the template, though their motives for adopting Bitcoin may differ.

But for El Salvador, the eventuality is clear - Bitcoin is set to replace the USD as the official currency of the country.

Why would El Salvador be shifting from the USD?

Bitcoin as a cryptocurrency is divisible, durable, digital, and trustless, in that, no one agency or person controls its supply and ownership.

Bitcoin as an asset class will enable an entirely new economy to take root in El Salvador, from technology to finance and wealth creation and distribution.

Imagine if Bitcoin was proven a better currency than the USD? That story could not be told. Specifically, that point could not be openly discussed on corporate media networks.

This tiny country of El Salvador is making headlines about dips and dives, snags and glitches on Bitcoin Day, while the pivotal point remains quiet.

Quiet acts of the revolution long preceded the first battle cry.

The Battles of Lexington and Concord were thought to have begun with the "shot heard around the world."

The Boston Tea Party, the Boston Massacre, Patrick Henry's famous "Give Me Liberty or Give Me Death" speech were well ahead of that shot.

El Salvador has taken a shot at the mighty-dollar. The headlines would read differently had El Salvador boldly come out and banned the USD.

Rather, a small nation perch high on the mountains off the Pacific Coast in the middle of Central America is conquering the giant.

The deadly weapon, the USD, has met its match. Bitcoin, the silent slayer.

The financial revolution has begun, very quietly.
